A number of universities in New Jersey – Princeton, Rutgers, Fairleigh Dickinson, Monmouth – have polls. But according to John Froomjian, a senior research associate with the Stockton Polling Institute, Stockton is the only one that actually employs students to conduct its polls, at least as far as he knows.

They're paid $8.38 an hour and usually are employed on evenings and weekends in shifts of four to eight hours at one of 30 call stations located in one large room on campus. It is not a telemarketing, sales or fundraising job. Instead, the purpose is to conduct research related to elections and issues of importance in southern New Jersey and across the state.

"I tell them it is a better campus job than cleaning tables or washing dishes," Froomjian.

They quickly learn, though, to deal with rejection.

First of all, they are calling cell as well as landline numbers, with the cell phone numbers being provided by private companies who collect such numbers. So, said Froomjian, the most common response when calling a cell phone customer is "How did you get my number?"

"They make about 25 calls
