

The media, academics, work-seeking consultants and that amorphous mass known as strategists have tripped over one another scrambling for bookings on network and cable talk shows to offer their insight and sage opinions on the party's future and its soon to be ex-president.

It's time to prick that bubble and reveal the wisdom as fool's gold.

While Trump may see himself as the colossus standing astride the party in January, establishment leaders who, while they've remained
