Galloway, NJ -

year co-sponsored with Congregation Beth Judah, continues Friday, July 24, in Ventnor, NJ with a lecture on medical immortality.

Dr. Nathaniel Hartman, assistant professor of Biology
Wants to Live Forever?

Medical Immortality: Who

Advancements in medical technology have made it possible for humans to overcome disease, repair broken organs and tissues and extend lifespan, Hartman notes. Public health initiatives have dramatically decreased infant mortality rate and modern agriculture has given us an abundance of food to stave off malnutrition. As the pace of biomedical research quickens, humans may come face to face with a new option - to never die.

In this lecture, Hartman will discuss the major advancements in the fields of regenerative medicine and brain-computer interface as ways to achieve medical immortality. He will explore the possibility of using medical advances in stem cell biology and bioengineering to avoid death. He will discuss some of the moral and ethical dilemmas that we will face as a society if technology allows us to overcome death.

Hartman joined the Biology Program at Stockton University in 2013. His courses have explored the nature of stem cells and the impacts of medical technology on society.
