electricity. Additionally, Stockton's 2,000 acre campus is located within the Pinelands National Reserve, making it an attractive choice for students with an interest in careers connected to the environment and sustainability. And, with Stockton's focus on community engagement and experiential learning, the program will expect students to take what they learn in the classroom and apply it in communities and businesses across the state as they learn.

Stockton Professor Patrick R. Hossay, its first Sustainability Professor and head of the program, said the College conducted an extensive review of the national and regional job markets and met with employers and educators from across New Jersey in an effort to add value to the
